I mostly agree with the statement that culture determines our perspectives of the world. There are several reasons which lead me to think this way. When I think of culture, I imagine my country's customs and traditions that hold particular value and importance. The holiday season in December is deeply rooted in culture, from how family get together from around the country and world to how we collectively celebrate the New Year. I know that many cultures share similar traditions at that time of year such eating special foods and visiting places of worship. Hoping for peace and joy is surely universal. On a visit to Greece, I happened to see a wedding taking place, the married couple were celebrating in the town square. Some aspects of the wedding were very familiar to my culture but there were interesting differences such as the couple wearing a crown linked with a ribbon that symbolized unity. I like to see small differences that offer new perspectives.

Culture is not only about tradition; we can see culture present in how people seek entertainment in society. For instance, I like to go to the movies and usually I will choose to see the latest blockbuster film but occasionally, I watch foreign language films with subtitles. It is a great way to get a window into another culture. Sport is also another type of culture that shapes who we are. Each nation has its national sport such as Sumo in Japan or Cricket in the United Kingdom. These sports can teach us something about the cultures in which they are developed.

It is for the reasons of shared traditions, differences and culture and how people see the everyday culture that I can say that culture determines our perspective of the world a lot.
